
by this Court. Introduction {#sec1-1} ===== Gastric duplication cysts are rare, accounting for approximately one-tenth of the gastric cysts encountered. \[@ref1] They present as the result of abnormal development of the foregut in the first or second week of gestation. Hagberg classified gastric duplications into three types based on the embryological origin and the relationship to the upper gastrointestinal tract: Type I (type I or complete duplication), duplication of all layers of the stomach; Type II (type II or incomplete duplication) or duplication of the antrum and lesser curvature of the stomach and Type III (type III or partial duplication) or duplication of only the greater curvature. \[@ref2] This paper describes a case of simple gastric duplication cyst and its endoscopic appearance. Case Report {#sec1-2} ===== A 28-year-old male patient presented with the complaints of loss of appetite, pain in the epigastric region associated with vomiting, and malodorous postprandial regurgitation. Upper gastrointestinal (GI) endoscopy performed at another center revealed a submucosal cyst arising from the lesser curvature of the antrum \Figure 1a\{ref-type="fig"}-[c](3e33713323
